Final Course Report - Clandestine Services Orientation Course
(30 September - 13 October 1959)

25X1 1. Synopsis: The Clandestine Services Orientation Course started on 30 September with an initial enrollment of seventy-three students. Although [redacted] withdrew from the course after the third day of instruction, [redacted]

25X1 [redacted] entered the course before its conclusion, making a final enrollment of seventy-eight. This second running of the orientation course was very successful and the organization of instruction and the effectiveness of guest speakers were much improved over our training efforts of January 1959.

2. Student Performance: The students showed high interest in the subject matter and appeared most attentive despite abominable working conditions created by a heat wave. Our guest speakers were very favorably impressed with the quick response and excellent questions received from the class. A majority of our guests compared this group favorably with the one trained in January.

3. Course Critique: The students were not required to submit course critiques. The following comments are based on my observations.

25X1 a. Administration: The administration of this course was very satisfactory. [redacted] did an excellent job in the preparation of materials, schedules and syllabus, and [redacted] of the Intelligence School gave me welcome assistance by forwarding telephone messages and preparing student attendance and security rosters.

25X1 b. Introduction: The introductory lectures by [redacted] built an excellent framework for the talks which followed on the Clandestine Services. [redacted] was direct and well organized, as always, and earned a warm response from the students. [redacted] talk was well coordinated with that of [redacted] there was no duplication.

and performed very well. Richard Bissell and Lyman Kirkpatrick were particularly effective, and Mr. Kirkpatrick did an excellent job in answering student questions which were submitted to him in advance in written form.

f. Seminars: The seminars which followed each major block of instruction were a useful device for satisfying student questions and will be retained in the next course.

4. Conclusions: The revision of January's course to ensure a logical flow of instruction and a more even development of subject matter proved effective in helping the students absorb a vast amount of information. I was favorably impressed with student seminar and discussion questions and with their apparent high interest in Clandestine Services programs and activities; I liked their professional attitude and discipline. Although I found no strong personalities like [redacted] in the group, working with these JOT's was a real challenge.

5. Recommendations:

a. The period 0830-0900 on the first day should be scheduled as "Registration and Introduction." The half hour 0900-0930 given to "Introduction" should be combined with the talk on the mission of the Clandestine Services. These changes will get us to the business at hand quickly and effectively.

b. The following lecture titles should be changed as noted:

1. What is the primary purpose of the proposed legislation?

The new titles will accurately describe scope and emphasis given to the subjects by our guest speakers.

c. Since the Clandestine Services planning system is being revised, we cannot make a final recommendation for improving the talks on this complex subject. We should consider, however, handling the discussion as we do that on the Operational Services. Such an arrangement would call for introductory remarks by the chief of the new Central Staff followed by detailed presentations by his senior division officers.

d. More time should be given to discussion of the components of the Operational Services. The speakers [redacted] had insufficient time to develop their subjects or to answer numerous student questions.

6. Seventy-five students took the objective examination. A list of their names and grades is attached.
